The origins of flavoured milk can be traced back to the early 20th century when milk processors began adding chocolate and other flavours to milk to make it more appealing to consumers. This was due in part to the fact that children often consumed milk, and many of them preferred the taste of flavoured milk over plain milk.

Flavoured milk was first introduced in the United States in the 1920s but was not widely available until the 1940s and 1950s. During this time, milk processors began experimenting with different flavours and packaging, and flavoured milk became more widely available.

In the 1960s, flavoured milk began to be marketed as a healthier alternative to soda and other sugary drinks. This was partly because milk is a good source of calcium and other essential nutrients.

In recent years, flavoured milk has become increasingly popular around the world. Many milk processors now offer a wide variety of flavoured milk, including chocolate, vanilla, and strawberry, as well as more unusual flavours like banana and caramel.
